Although etiological factors are not well understood, unconscious as well as conscious group processes likely contribute to self-destructive actions. In this article we discuss the role of projective identification in the development of suicidal behaviour by individuals who are part of a destructive group.

Destructive Groups: The Role of Projective Identification ...

The book is neither "for," nor "against" projective identification, it is rather an interrogation about what legitimized and even imposed the emergence of this new notion. Undertaking such an interrogation is even more righteous as the "projective identification" suffered a certain vulgarization as a result of its success.

What is Projective Identification. When projection takes place, it is a personal process, working in the mind of one person, such that, the person on whom the behavior is being projected on, has no idea that it is happening. Projective identification plays on this projection and adds more levels to it.

Projective Identification Explained With Examples ...

Projective identification is a complex and much misunderstood concept in the world of psychotherapy. The term originated of course from the work of Melanie Klein in her ground breaking work on the paranoid-schizoid and depressive phases of childhood development in the 1940s and has since been much researched and expanded upon.
